A Bowl Full of Peace

A True Story

Caren Stelson, illus. Akira Kusaka

When the atomic bomb fell on Nagasaki, Japan, on August 9, 1945, Sachiko's home turned to rubble. Yet a delicate, green, leaf-shaped bowl—which once held her family's meals—survived intact and came to serve as a vessel of hope and peace.

- A powerful picture book about finding hope and peace after the atomic bombing of Nagasaki, timed to coincide with the 75th anniversary in August 2020.
- From the author of Sachiko, which was longlisted for the National Book Award
- Stunning illustrations from Japanese artist Akira Kusaka (in his American picture book debut)

His face crumples. Oh, no. I think he's about to cry.

"Are you all right?" I gotta go. Now! But I can't leave him like this. I park my bike and run over to his house.

"I'm okay," he says with a big sigh. "But Nana-chan isn't."

He motions me inside, where I see that Nana-chan is not barking, not scooting around with her flippers, and not blinking. In fact, she—isn't moving at all. Looks like she needs to be recharged.

"I think you have to, uh, plug it in," I say, not sure if it's okay to remind him that his pet is a machine. Maybe we're supposed to act like it's a living thing.

He drops down to his knees, completely helpless.

I glance toward the door, then take a deep breath. This is going to make me late for school for sure, but I'll help him out just this once. I turn

I leap. As I do, the train blasts past, and the force of the wind slams me forward so hard that I lose my breath. I roll over in the sand until I land on my back, staring at the sky. My system is in shock at first, like always. The hive of bees flaps haphazardly within my gut and chest, banging into organs and each other, total chaos. Perhaps this time I cut it a little too close, and there's a distinct possibility I'm not breathing right now.

Death sighs, lazily swirling around as if entertaining me with her own mini tornado. When will you tire of this ridiculous game of cat and mouse?

Not till it ends. You know: everyone roasts for the mouse.

Perhaps. But the cat always wins. Death shakes her head with a forlorn expression, then disintegrates into nothingness.

Boom! My heart starts pumping again, each beat bumping into the next, fighting for first place in line. I make a concerted effort to inhale. At first the breath holds too little oxygen, but gradually the air travels through my blood to my organs, quieting the bees.

I carefully pat my arms, my face, my legs, checking for missing parts or blood. I've lost the top layer of skin on the undersides of both arms. There's sand in my mouth and wedged in the cracks of my eyes, but I don't care. I've cheated Death once again. Nothing makes me feel more alive.

Chapter 2

My younger sister, Saffron, pokes her head into our jack-and-jill bathroom, where I'm standing, shirtless, to disinfect my bloodied arms.

"Uh, privacy?" I remind her. The stinging from the alcohol wipes is making me cranky. There's more blood than I thought there'd be. The scrapes on the underside of my left arm vaguely resemble Hawaii. "This is a bathroom, you know."

Saffron shakes her head in disgust as I consider pointing out the plethora of grosser things I could be doing in the bathroom. She steps inside and partially closes the door behind her so that she can point to the tiny lock. "Cayenne, I'd like to introduce you to a bathroom lock. Lock, meet my sister Cayenne. She's somehow made it to her senior year of high school without making your acquaintance."

"Very funny." I contemplate my arms, casualties of my train dodge. I'm not squeamish, but I do like to keep my shirts

10:05 a.m.
Ben pulled up in front of T's house and threw the car into park. The sky was blue and the sun was shining. The day ahead sparkled with possibilities. The road trip, the music festival, no homework, no yard work . . . no work, period. Just three friends in a car, listening to good music. Ben bounded up to the front porch and rang the bell three times. Then one more time, just for fun.

T's dad, looking grumpy and exhausted, came to answer the door. He paused, narrowing his eyes just long enough to make Ben fidget. Then he relented and said, "Hello, Ben."

"Good morning, Mr. Rivera. Sorry about the bell. I thought . . . um, is T ready?"

T's mom rescued him, her voice singing out from somewhere deep inside in the house. "Is that Ben? Ben, do you want some fruit before you go?"

Mr. Rivera waved him in, holding the door open. "Come on in. He's ready. His mother is just concerned he'll starve if left to his own devices for a weekend."

T's little sister came running to the door. She was still in her pajamas. "Hi, Ben!"

"Hey, Sofia." Ben mussed up her hair and she ducked away, wrinkling her nose.

"Stop it, ugh." She smoothed her hair self-consciously.

"Why are you home? Shouldn't you be at school?"

"I'm sick," she said cheerfully. "Except I kind of feel better now so I'm just watching TV. I was up all night puking though. My dad is working from home today so my mom can get some sleep."

Mr. Rivera nodded. "She got called into the
